Not illustrated. 1881 Excerpt: . and speaks thus of his Aunt James: a poor, religious, wellmeaning, good soul, talking of nothing but God Almighty, and that with so much innocence that mightily pleased me. He is taken with Pen s merriment and loose songs, but not less taken with the sterling worth of Coventry. He is jolly with a drunken sailor, but listens with interest and patience, as he rides the Essex roads, to the story of a Quaker s spiritual trials and conrictions. He lends a critical ear to the discourse of kings and royal dukes. He spends an evening at Vauxhall with Kiliigrew and young Newport--loose company, says lie, but worth a man s being in for once, to know the nature of it, and their manner of talk and lives. And when a rag boy lights him home, he examines him about his business and other ways of livelihood for destitute children. This is almost halfway to the beginning of philanthropy; had it only been the fashion, as it is at present, Pepys had perhaps been a man famous for good deeds. And it is through this quality that he rises, at times, superior to his surprising egotism; his interest in the love affairs of others is, indeed, impersonal; he is filled with concern for my Lady Castlemaine, whom he only knows by sight, shares in her very jealousies, joys with her in her successes; and it is not untrue, however strange it seems in his abrupt...
