Self Synchronizing of Alternators Prof. Morgan Brooks presented a brief paper in which he explained his system of paralleling alternators. This consists merely of providing a coreless reactance coil in series with the generator to be cut into the circuit, and closing the switch to the bus-bars. It matters not whether the incoming alternator be in step with the machines connected to the bus-bars or not; the switch can be closed regardless of synchronism and the machine will be pulled into step with relatively small crosscurrents. The local Edison company provided means for demonstrating the device, and this was done at the reading of the paper. A 200-kilowatt 25-cycle alternator was connected up to the bus-bars of one of the Edison power stations several times under widely different conditions, the instruments indicating the results being located in the convention hall and connected to the alternator and bus-bars through heavy cables. Instructions were telephoned from the hall to the switchboard operator in the station and he made the connections accordingly. When the alternator was connected to the bus-bars christ, of Chicago.
