Excerpt: .pieces, as shown in the figure, and the two parts are held together by a strong rubber band (not shown) and kept from sliding sidewise by the pins 55. The face of the smaller section was filed, so as to always make a contact at the end of the block. This makes a satisfactory slide, free from contacts having strong thermo-electric power. It is necessary, however, to polish the wires with fine emery cloth before using. This is especially true of the copper wire; a small quantity of oxide making the resistance of the contact variable so that no satisfactory adjustment is possible. After a balance of the bridge was obtained the thermo-electric current in the galvanometer circuit was compensated and then again the final balance of the bridge made. The quantity of induced electricity passing through the galvanometer at the opening of the...
